Meeting the Challenge of Sustainability at the University of Pennsylvania

President Gutmann has stated that Penn puts "a premium on environmental responsibility ... because great universities have a duty to serve as leading agents of long-range thinking and action that will sustain humankind today, tomorrow, and for generations to come."

How has the University, as a large and complex organization, responded to this challenge, and what are the key tools that can be used at a university with such distributed authority?

Dan Garofalo was appointed to the position of Environmental Sustainability Coordinator in April of 2009, and works within the Division of Facilities and Real Estate Services to develop strategies to meet the goal set by President Gutmann. In this talk, Dan will discuss the environmental strategies that have been adopted by the University, its successes, and its near and long-term objectives.
